beautiful wording

The Cuban people as a whole feel trapped in their world of terror and unrest. The Cubans became fearful as their dictator Raul Castro gained total power of the nation. The people lived a life full of terror & uneasiness, to the point that migration is ^{still} their only option. This deep longing to better their lives, drives them to embark on a hazardous journey towards freedom.

The United States how must balance and control the acceptance of these immigrants. The majority of Cubans have survived the journey illegally. The U.S. is faced with thousands of cases they must sort out. Recently, the U.S. has come across 25,000 Cubans who have traveled without the necessary visa. The U.S. is now faced with this current issue constantly as people helplessly flee to the U.S. out of desperation.

Some Cubans turned to smugglers in order to attempt an escape from the life they lived. They contribute their ideas, money, and labor in order to receive the smuggler's services. Unfortunately for most Cubans, this is not a way of migration they have access to. The average price for a smuggler's task ranges from $5,000 to $200,000 or more.

Form might be better rather than work here

These Cubans are left to their own devices in order to survive. These people's dedication drives them to make do with what they have in order to escape their reality. Boats made of the simplest things such as scuba metal, scraps of stainless steel, old car parts, inner tubes, and plastic foam have occasionally aided in the Cubans' task towards freedom. This means of transportation remains a constant hazard, but the use is taken by dedicated individuals.

These boats provide little to no guaranteed outcome of survival. They often lack the efficient items needed to embark on this complicated journey. Navigation and life saving equipment are absent, leaving the people to use old fashion tactics. These journeys of 90 mile crossings the Cuban's take result in many deaths.

The people are often left lost at sea with complicated engine trouble. The passengers eat the contaminated food sources, until all they have left are natural resources such as fish and water. The journey is ultimately a path of death, but the few survivors' life after survival makes it all worth it.

The Cubans know what is in store for them on their journey but are willing to take this risk." Mr. Lao said, "I would tell anyone in Cuba to come. It's better to die on your feet than live on your knees" (Sholchet, Cohen, + Fantz). This represents the drive behind the thousands of immigrants that have arrived this year alone. Each year, Cubans figure out more advanced and effective ways of transportation. This year, 22,500 Cubans have arrived in the United States; this number has trumped last year's by double.

Although the Cubans now experience the equality and justice the US brings, the United States is left in crisis. The country now experiences tensions with Cuba. The United States has provided an immigration policy that gives special treatment to Cubans and loosened travel restrictions. Fidel Castro keeps the US efforts in mind as he loses more and more people.

The migration of countless Cubans has a ^{politically} ~~has~~ effect on the United States as they must control the many who come here illegally. Socially, the Cuban culture and environment pushes away its citizens under the rule of Kaul Castro. Economically, thousands of dollars are wasted with in the ~~rich~~ ^{rich} of smuggling. The freedom the Cubans gain by migrating results with the US + Cuba immigration
